

INVASION – MUNSAN-NI-KORANGP'O-RI

ASL KW Scenario Day 1.4 v2

Kaesong, South Korea, 25 June 1950. Back in Seoul, Colonel Paik awakened shortly after daylight that Sunday morning to the sound artillery fire. Paik phoned his headquarters and ordered the 11th Regiment and other units to move immediately to Munsan-ni-Korangp'o-ri and occupy prearranged defensive positions. Colonel Paik then drove directly to Munsan-ni. The 11th Regiment moved rapidly and in good order from Suisak and took position on the left of the 13th Regiment, both thereby protecting the approaches to the Imjin bridge.

Aftermath: The NK 1st Division and supporting tanks of the 105th Armored Brigade attacked in the Munsan-ni-Korangp'o-ri area. At first some ROK soldiers of the 13th Regiment engaged in suicide tactics, hurling themselves and the high explosives they carried under the tanks. Others approached the tanks with satchel or pole charges. Some mounted tanks and tried desperately to open the hatches with hooks to drop grenades inside. They destroyed a few tanks but most of them were killed, and volunteers for this duty soon became scarce. The ROK 1st Division held its positions at Korangp'o-ri for nearly three days and then, outflanked and threatened with being cut off by the enemy divisions in the Uijongbu Corridor, it withdrew toward the Han River.
